

The Design of my Website

To organize my website, I decided on a design where the main text would be in the center and the images would be on the sides. I segmented everything using a table into three columns in one row to make sections easier to resize and position. The text would be in the middle and this column would have the largest width because this is what I want to be the focus. The images on the left and right columns would be smaller to just add some details to what I am talking about in each section of text. The headings are aligned to the left along with putting two images on the left because I feel that most people read from left to right on a website, as they do when reading American books.

In the texts, I included some links to share more about myself. I made links for two songs on YouTube, one that goes to the Brooklyn college website about my major, and one that goes to a Wikipedia article on my favorite animal. I displayed some links inline so they would not skip a line and set their targets to blank so they would open a new page because it would be distracting if the main page suddenly switched.

I picked blueish colors because blue is one of my favorite colors. The background of the entire website is a dark shade and the backgrounds/borders where there is text have an even darker shade to show different sections. The color of the text is a light shade which is easily readable with the dark backgrounds.

One problem I had was figuring out how to position the images. I tried to use an absolute position, but for some reason they could not resize when the browser was resized. In the end, I decided to use a table design and positioned them in columns, and they were able to resize. I also considered using a bunch of whitespace characters to separate sections but then it was very unorganized having to copy and paste so many characters.
